Gerald Herbert/Associated Press As the Miami Heat continue to hold out hope that two-time MVP guard Dwyane Wade can return to the court this season, the NBA collectively is starting to accept the idea that he may not. Marc Stein of ESPN reports that Wade is not likely to play this year and is not expected back on the court until at least January. "Even the most optimistic among the Heat's medical staff recognize the odds of a return this season as long as they cannot find a way to bring back Wade without jeopardizing the health of his left knee," Stein wrote. The injury to Wade's knee is quite similar to what ultimately limited Paul George's playing time last season. Just when LeBron James said he was at his "peak of his career," George suffered a stress fracture in his left leg that ended his season. Wade's range of motion in his knee has been limited since the injury, but he was in no danger of missing training camp or All-Star Weekend. Wade is arguably the greatest player of his generation. In 2009, a year after becoming the first guard to earn multiple MVP honors since Michael Jordan in 1990, he won the scoring title, made the All-Star game and led the Heat to the NBA Finals. At the time, Miami—then considered a 10-seed in a tough-to-match Eastern Conference—finished with a 43-39 record, missing the playoffs by two games. For much of the next nine years, he was seen as a consummate teammate, a fun-loving personality and a catch-and-shoot threat 3da54e8ca3
