A comparison of the characteristics of hospitalized patients who have attempted suicide and have been accepted to a psychiatric unit. The aims of this study were to determine whether there are differences in the sociodemographic characteristics, motives for suicide attempts, and psychiatric diagnoses of inpatients who attempt suicide and have been accepted to psychiatric inpatient units, compared with inpatients who make a suicide attempt but do not have to be admitted to inpatient units. Consecutive inpatients were assessed during a 6-month period. Subjects were assessed by psychiatrists using semistructured interviews. Patients who had suicidal intent but did not require admission to the psychiatric unit were excluded. The same was done with the new finding that patients who attempted suicide did not have to be admitted to the psychiatric unit. All subjects gave informed consent to participate in the study. Both patients who attempted suicide and those who attempted suicide but were not admitted to inpatient units were slightly younger than the general inpatients. The suicide attempters who were not admitted to an inpatient unit had more often a history of previous suicide attempts, and a suicide intent at the index attempt more often than the other patients. The patients admitted to an inpatient unit who attempted suicide had more often a diagnosis of substance use disorders, and less often a personality disorder than the patients who attempted suicide but did 0cc13bf012
