of identifying and numbering the pedicle screws in computed tomography scans. The purpose of this study was to evaluate an objective method of identifying and numbering pedicle screws. A sequential composite of computed tomography (CT) scans of a cadaveric spine was used to test the technique. A computer program superimposed individual spine elements to create a composite CT scan. A scanner was positioned to reproduce the original positions of the spine elements and screws. The pedicle screws were numbered consecutively in the original CT scan, and the same numbers were transferred to the composite CT scan. A total of 558 screws, positioned in 40 pedicles were evaluated. There was an average error of 0.6 mm in identification of the screw position.

Ninety-three percent of screws were successfully associated with the pedicles that they were intended to be in, and a total of 623 screws were identified in the 40 pedicles evaluated. The accuracy of the technique in marking the pedicle and locating the correct
