Molecular biological aspects of human sleep-related mental disorders. Sleep is important for the maintenance of physical and mental health. The Sleep and/or Psychotic Syndrome (SPS) group includes a heterogeneous group of conditions characterized by inappropriate wake and/or dream-related experiences that is distinguished from other sleep-related disturbances, including parasomnias and circadian disorders. Many disorders of the SPS group are diagnosed based on a combination of a subjective experience by the patient and a physical finding on a patient's medical examination. There is a lack of knowledge on how diverse neural circuits may interact in the creation of sleep-related mental disorders. The changes of the sleep process, including energy metabolism, neurotransmission and many other intracellular signaling molecules, provide a molecular basis for the development of sleep-related mental disorders. The main neurotransmitter systems involved in the regulation of sleep include serotonin, gamma-aminobutyric acid (GABA), noradrenalin, opioid, acetylcholine and histamine. Neural circuits of sleep also interact with the cholinergic system, which includes the locus coeruleus and nucleus basalis of Meynert. Sleep disorders are not only related to various medical conditions, but are also linked to mental disorders such as depression, anxiety and schizophrenia. In this review, we discuss the nature of sleep and somnolence disorders from the perspective of sleep regulation and how these disorders are linked to psychological disturbances.
